Problem Statement

Customers in many regions also get packaged milk, which is transported to them through a wide distribution channel. This is convenient but does not provide information regarding the handling and freshness of milk. Small dairy farmers often sell their milk through cooperatives or middlemen, which reduces their profitability and limits their interaction with customers.

Due to the high perishability of milk, unsold milk may lead to waste and economic loss for dairy farmers. Customers also face problems in purchasing milk directly from local dairy farmers, such as a lack of awareness regarding local dairy farms, the quality of milk, and the ordering and delivery system.

Objective

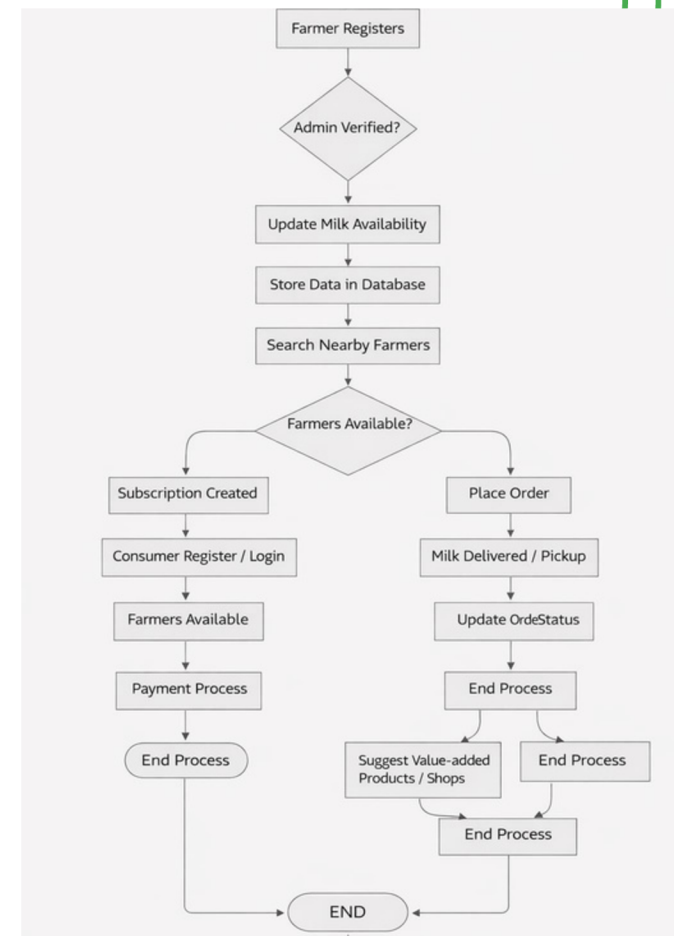

To propose a Hyperlocal Direct Milk Supply Platform is a web-based platform aimed at connecting dairy farmers directly with consumers within a specific local radius. This platform enables consumers to access real-time information about milk availability, price, collection, or delivery from the farmers.

Consumers can easily access information about milk freshness, browse available milk, order milk, or even subscribe to regular milk supplies from a simple interface. To further minimize waste, the platform also enables farmers to convert unsold milk into value-added products such as paneer, butter, and ghee, which can be sold through the same platform. This will not only increase farmer incomes but also minimize waste, providing consumers with easy access to fresh milk.
